二、題組 (21-40 題， 20 題)

Do you use your computer for more than ten hours a day? Are you having meals while using your smartphone? Do you play online games, check Facebook, or go online for everything every day? Do you often lose track of time and miss many important things because of the Internet? If your answers are “yes,” you may have an “excessive Internet use.”

The “excessive Internet use” is not that different from other excessive ones. Excess of everything is bad. The excessive Internet use can lead to lonely and unhappy feelings, bad grades at school, damage to eye health, and communication problems with friends or family. And you may also get mad easily when things don't go your ways.

However, there are many ways to deal with those problem to keep your body and mind healthy. Try to write a to-do list, then do those things without the screen, and finish them in time. Put down your smartphone while you're eating, and don't check your phone all the time. Go outdoors to do some exercises, get fresh air, and enjoy nature every day. When you want to use the Internet, make a plan first, set screen time limit, and take breaks often, so you won't waste too much time on it.

A family picture of Nicholas Winton with one of the hundreds of Jewish children whose lives he saved during World War II. ----Associated Press	Nicholas Winton at aged 98

Sir Nicholas Winton

Mrs. Winton found his husband's scrapbooks at the attic. The scrapbooks inside with names, pictures, letters from family and many papers. She asked her husband for what happened. But Mr. Winton said he thought the papers had no value. That moment, she knew her husband was a Hero. His work was not noticed by the world for 50 years. She explored it and Mr. Nicholas Winton was invited to the BBC television program “That's Life!”, where he was reunited with several of the 669 children he had saved.

Back to the time before Christmas 1938, Mr. Winton, a 29-year-old stockbroker, was planning to travel to a skiing holiday. Then a call for help from friends. He raised more money to rescue children in Czech. Their parents were killed even while many of Czech families sold all things to pay for their kids' escape. On the March 14, 1938, all came together at the station. The survivors said the final moment before departure, the children cried not to be sent away, and parents faced giving up their children.

Mr. Winton and his friends arranged for eighth more trains to get the children out of Czech and arrived in London, England. There, he and host families met the children. But still about 250 children on the last train couldn't be saved out. On Sept. 1, 1939, however, on that day, Hitler invaded and closed all borders. Winton's rescue efforts came to an end. None of the 250 children was ever seen again. All were believed to be sent to the concentration camps.

Many of 669 children went on works in different fields, and their descendants were over 6000 people. Many now in their 70s and 80s, still call themselves "Winton's children".

How did he do so hard work? Nicholas Winton's said his motto, "If something is not impossible, then there must be a way to do it." He was awarded many honours. He died in his sleep, in 2015, at the age of 106.

(五) Coronavirus Myths by Coach Jeff (好讀週報)

Over the past few months, the new coronavirus has caused sickness around the world. At the same time, “fake news” about the coronavirus has spread faster than the virus itself. For example, it has been wrongly reported that men need to shave their beards to protect themselves from the virus. Another myth was people with dark skin cannot catch the coronavirus, another claim that is completely false. There were even reports that drinking black tea could cure people with Covid-19! Again, this misinformation has been easily disproved.

Perhaps the silliest rumor was that new 5G cellphone technology is responsible for the spread of the new coronavirus. Some people have said 5G harms the immune system of people. Another says the virus is spread by 5G signals. “Complete rubbish,” laughed one scientist. Another scientist stressed that viruses and 5G signals are “as different as chalk and cheese.”

shave 刮	beard 鬍子	disproved 證實的	silliest 最愚蠢的
fake 假的	misinformation 錯誤訊息	signal 信號
virus 病毒	immune 免疫	myth 迷思	stress 強調
responsible 負責任的	cure 治療	spread 散佈	harm 傷害
claim 宣稱	purpose 目的	avoid 避免	explain 解釋

38. What is the main purpose of the article?

- (A) To describe ways to avoid getting the coronavirus while using a cellphone.
- (B) To explain why people spread rumors.
- (C) To correct some wrong information about the coronavirus.
- (D) To teach people how to cure the sick men.

39. All these are examples of misinformation EXCEPT_____

- (A) Growing a beard can protect you from the coronavirus.
- (B) 5G technology has helped to spread the coronavirus.
- (C) Black tea is a good cure for people who got sick from the coronavirus.
- (D) People with dark skin cannot catch the coronavirus.

40. Why did a scientist use the phrase “as different as chalk and cheese”?

- (A) To give examples of things that harm the immune system.
- (B) To stress that viruses cannot be spread by phone signals.
- (C) To describe a fake cure for the coronavirus.
- (D) To tell people the news about curing the sick people with Covid-19.
