Two men, Tom and Rod, were travelling together along the road when one of them picked up a bag left on the ground.

"How lucky I am!" Rod said, "I just found a bag. Judging by its weight it must be full of gold."

"Don't say 'I found,'" said Tom, "Say 'we found' and 'how lucky we are.' Friends should share everything together."

"Oh, very well." said the other slowly.

Just then they heard a shout of "Stop, you thief!" and turning around, saw some people with sticks in their hands coming down the road angrily.

The one who had found the bag got scared.

"We are in big trouble if they find the bag on us," he cried.

"No, no," said the other, "You would not say 'we' in the first place, so now stick to your 'I'. Say 'I am in big trouble.'"

Rod knew that he had to face the anger of the people alone. He made himself walk up to the owner of the bag and said, "Is this your bag, Sir? I found it on the ground, and I keep waiting here for its owner to come. I didn't steal it or keep it for myself." On hearing this, the owner thanked Rod with all his heart and even asked him to receive some gold for giving back the bag.

"Thank you, my Dearest Friend," Rod said seriously, "For teaching me to say 'I' not 'we'. From now on, there is only 'I' not any 'we'."

We cannot expect any one to share our trouble even with our close friends.

(D) No, because Rod found out what kind of person Tom really was.

In May 1980, an uprising happened in Gwangju, the poorest city in Korea. Jurgen Hinzpeter, a German reporter working in Japan, wanted to report it. He soon flew to Seoul, the biggest city in Korea. It was difficult for any foreigners to enter Gwangju because the soldiers and the police didn't want the world to know any facts about the uprising. However, Jurgen's friend still found him a taxi driver, Kim Sa-bok.

Flying to Gwangju from Seoul saved a lot of time, but Jurgen still jumped into Kim's taxi and went to Gwangju. On their way there, they found a lot of signs saying "Closed," but these signs didn't stop Jurgen and Kim from going to Gwangju. When they were near Gwangju, some soldiers saw them and told them to turn back. However, they didn't want to give up. Kim found other ways to Gwangju by crossing a lot of farms, and finally they got to Gwangju.

Everything in the city worried Jurgen and Kim. The police caught a lot of students and people just because they joined the uprising. Soldiers even attacked students in front of their families and friends. Jurgen took a lot of photos and brought them back to Japan a few days later.
